Meeting Report

Executive Summary:

The meeting discussed two topics related to the NFL: the current overtime format and the evolution of franchise values since the 1990s.

Key Topics:

- * Overtime format in the NFL

- * Evolution of franchise values since the 1990s, specifically the increase in revenue and value

Action Items: None clearly identified.

Decisions Made:

None clearly identified.

Unanswered Questions:

- The current structure of the coin toss in overtime (whether it should be changed to allow both teams a chance to score)
- Potential implications of the increasing franchise values on team management and strategy

Important Notes:

- * Zane expressed concerns about the fairness of the current overtime format, suggesting that both teams should have a chance to score.

- * The increase in franchise value since the 1990s has had a significant impact on the NFL, including increased player pay and revenue from television contracts.

- * Michael Ooyard's "New NFL" concept is seen as having been instrumental in in this growth, with labor-peace agreements, television contracts, and stadium revenue being key cornerstones.

Zane, I would like to know your thoughts on these scholarly articles. The first one is by Wayne Winston. When an NFL game goes into overtime, a coin toss takes place and the team that wins the coin toss has the choice of kicking off or receiving. For many years, the OT had a sudden death format and the team winning the coin toss and verably chose to receive so they have the first chance to score and win the game. What are your thoughts on that? Yeah, I think that was a pretty stupid rule. I'm not going to lie. I don't think that's really fair to both teams. I mean, when you get to overtime, that means the games even at that point. I think both teams should have a chance to score and it shouldn't be decided by a coin toss. Yeah, right. I read about 60% of teams that get the ball first, usually win an overtime. And then the next was called the new NFL by Michael Ooyard. In 1989, the league took 975 million in revenue and the average franchise was worth about 100 million. The recent figures calculated by Forbes Magazine in 2006 are 6.2 billion and a hundred and ninety-eight million. For perspective, Forbes noted that the increase in franchise value since 1998 was 11 times the growth of the S&P; 500 over that same period. The new NFL that emerged in the 1990s had the cornerstones, labor-peace, television contracts, and stadium revenue. What are your thoughts on this and how has this affected the NFL? I think it's affected the NFL greatly. I mean, players are getting paid more than they've ever been paid before. It's a good thing they deserve to get a nice little payday. It brings in a nice big fan-based television audience. It's just doing a lot for the league. I really think it's a great thing. I really think it helps the sport around overall. Thank you, Zen.
